February, 1887, the Vice President read a lengthy communication from the assistant physician, Dr. John Brodie, upon the hygienic condition of the hospital buildings, referring specially to the imperfect ventilation under the main buildings, defective drainage, and imperfect and inconvenient arrangement of the water closets and bathrooms, closing with recomendations, strongly expressed, for considerable and radical changes throughout. The Executive Committee was promptly authorized to carry out the recommendations of Dr. Brodie, and whatever else seemed necessary for them to accomplish the end in view. The expenses attending these improvements has greatly exceeded their anticipated cost, and there yet remains much to be done in building and repairs, and to the quarters required for the servants, the present buildings occupied for

A writer in The London Daily News, mentioning the wonderful increase of flowers in England which modern floriculture has brought about, says: "Remembering not only how few were our English flowers originally, but how small and poor in form and color they were, it is hardly exaggeration to say that the entire floral wealth of our gardens is a creation of modern skill and enterprise. Our forefathers could no more have imagined our toses, our nansios and hyacinths, our tulips and pelargoniums, our liles and rhododendrons, than they could have conceived of many of the wonders and conveniences of modern dwellings and towns." The old English poets were very enthusiastic and melodious on the subject of flowers; but it is certain that they never had any idea c the perfection to which flowers could be brought by intelligent cultivation.-New Orleans TimesBIBLIOMANIA IN NEW YORK.

A Second Hand Booksellers Tells of His Patrons' Peculiarities. There prevails an impression that any one who really knows a valuable book when he sees it can go about the second hand book stores and pick up bargains in plenty. This is altogether a mistaken notion. The trouble is that so many do know a good book when they see it and so are on the lookout for rare copies. Booksellers, too-at least a majority of them-now know the relative values of books, and he is a lucky collector who nowadays gets a volume much under its actual worth. Of course different persons set different values on certain works. But as a rule the dealer's price is not often thought to be low. A down town bookseller who deals in all kinds of books, old and new, said to the writer who asked him for a certain edition of an old classic the other day: If that book were here it would have been sold long before this. We have had half a dozen men in here already to-day, looking for rare old books. You have no idea how many come in every day on that errand. They come in and spend an hour, sometimes two, looking over our shelves. They rarely tell us what they are after. There are some old gentlemen who visit us regularly about three times a week. They know our stock as well as we do ourselves. Not one of them buys more than a half a dozen volumes a year, but they seem to be quite satisfied with what they get for their labor. Of course we have a great many transcient callers on the same errand. It often make me laugh to see them looking wise and eagerly going over the shelves, evidently under the impression that they are in unexplored fields. Just as likely as not some one, who knows a good thing when he sees it, has been all over the books half an hour before. Some of them take every volume in their hands and turn over a few pages. ' A good many come in just to have a look at the books. There are unscrupulous dealers, and when they see that a man wants a particular book they raise the price on him. But your regular book collector isn't green. Many a time I have seen him trying to get a valuable edition of some book by pretending that it was common, depending on the dealer's ignorance not to know its worth. I remember once I had a volume of the "Tattler" that was very old and worn, and I thought it was worth all of $5. I hadn't it long when one of my old visitors came in. He knew nearly all my stock and he must have seen this "Tattler" at once, but he passed it by without so much as touching it. Then he came back and, contrary to his custom, remarked that he didn't see anything he wanted. He was just going out of the door when he suddenly turned round and said that he had forgotten to get a boc. that his wife wanted. While I was wrapping it up he picked up the volume of the "Tattler" in a careless way, saying: "Ah, here is another of these copies of the 'Tattler.' It's a good deal like the one I have at home, but mine is worn out. This one is only a little better, but you will be sure to let me have it cheap and I might as well take it along." "Just as you like," I replied, carelessly. "You can have it for $5." Of course, he was thunderstruck; surely, I was making a mistake, and all that sort of thing. But I wouldn't budge, and he gave me my price with a very bad grace. The fact is, these old collectors don't half care for a book unless they get it at a price they think away below cost. Then they go away chuckling at -bot thow call their

was asked. "From the libraries of these very men who collect them. When they die their libraries are often sold with the rest of their effects, and usually at ridiculously low figures. The men who buy old furniture often get them for nothing stowed away in drawers. Anyhow, they sell for very little when disposed of by an auctioneer who knows nothing about them. You see, most of our customers are comparatively poor men, who often get a book that they prize at the sacrifice of a meal."--Cor. New York Commercial Ad-
